

Therapeutic Guidelines are evidence in context

Therapeutic Guidelines provide clear and concise, independent and evidence-based recommendations for patient management that have been developed by Australia's leading experts.

These experts, with their many years of clinical experience, work with skilled medical editors to sift and sort through research data, systematic reviews, local protocols and other sources of information, to ensure that the clear and practical recommendations that are developed are based on the best available evidence.

“Scientific journals have a very important role to play, but they are primarily for researchers. There is not enough information in a journal article for even a well-read person to judge [it]...busy clinicians are better to look at filtered knowledge”

Sir Muir Gray, Director of Clinical Knowledge, National Health Service, United Kingdom
(Excerpt from Health Report interview, ABC Radio National, 14 November 2005)
