Lisa Bourke

Associate Professor Lisa Bourke is a rural sociologist in the Rural Health Academic Centre, University of Melbourne. Lisa has over twenty years’ experience conducting national, state and community projects in rural and remote communities in the US and Australia. Lisa’s key research interests include rural health as a discipline, the wellbeing of rural young people, rural community resilience, and social research methods. Her current research projects address theoretical understandings of rural and remote health and young people’s access to rural sexual health services.
