One month to go to submit an abstract for the 15th National Rural Health Conference in Hobart next March

If you would like to share your work with delegates at the 15th National Rural Health Conference in Hobart next March, you have just one month to write and submit an abstract.

The Call for Abstracts closes on 20 August 2018.

The National Rural Health Conference is Australia's leading biennial rural and remote health event. The 15th is being held in Hobart from 24 - 27 March 2019 with the theme Better together!

The program is shaping up, with the opening session to focus on the benefits of working together across professions, across sectors, and across regional and national borders. Presentations on day two will feature the latest evidence on the health situation in rural and remote Australia, followed by examples of best practice health services that are working well.

Following the pre-conference workshop on the issue, day three will focus on the determinants of health, with presentations from leading international researchers in the field as well as consumer and ecological input. The plenary presentations on the final day will feature the ways in which, working together, the health sector can have greater success in the coming years.

The Conference Advisory Committee would like to hear from consumers and leaders of the health sector, including researchers, policy makers, health service managers and clinicians. Presentations from those in the non-health sector are also welcome.

The Abstract Guidelines, including a list of potential topics, are available on the Conference website at: www.ruralhealth.org.au/15nrhc

Don't miss this opportunity to share your work with other leaders in the rural health and related sectors.
